

Generalist vs specialist

What is the issue?

\n\n

\n

- The debate on generalists and specialists is kick-started with rising demands for lateral entry into civil services.

\n

- Also, the changing nature of government creates the need for a reassessment of the nature of civil servants involved in administration.

\n

What is the need for specialisation?

\n\n

\n

- Changing nature - The Indian Administrative Service(IAS) was modelled on the colonial era Indian Civil Service as a generalist service.

\n

- It was conceived primarily to deliver the core functions of the state such as tax collection and maintenance of law and order.

\n

- But with the evolution of public administration and economic reforms changing the State's role, there is a higher demand for domain knowledge at policy level.

\n

- Drawbacks - IAS, as generalists, tend to over-weigh their experience of the process and form over understanding of policy content.

\n

- Generalists heading specialised areas seems to be an inefficient arrangement at times.

\n

- There is also a misconception that only generalists who have a breadth of understanding and experience can provide best leadership.

\n

- All these have raised questions about the role and relevance of the generalised IAS.

What could be done?

\n\n

- \n
 - The Constitution Review Commission 2002 suggested the “need to specialise some of the generalists and generalise some of the specialists”.
 - \n
 - However the task of managing specialisation needs the consideration of many factors:
 - \n
 - When - From generalised field postings in the initial decade of service, an IAS gradually moves to policy formulating positions.
 - \n
 - This mid-career level transition provides the ideal marker for beginning to specialise.
 - \n
 - How - Possibly, complying to the demands of behavioural attributes and aptitudes, ministries could be broadly categorised into three groups - welfare, regulatory and economic ministries.
 - \n
 - Secondly, specialisation process needs to be flexible according to the preference of IAS officers.
 - \n
 - Given this flexibility, it is also essential that the government make the process more predictable and transparent to avoid favouritism.
 - \n
 - Thirdly, once allocated to specialist positions, officers should be provided study and training for deepening their domain knowledge.
 - \n
 - In addition to these, the specialised lateral entrants should be required to “generalise” through field postings.
 - \n
 - The nature of policy-making at present demands that specialist expertise has to go with generalist experience.
 - \n
 - Thus, proper cadre management that provides for a right proportion of generalisation and specialisation can improve the efficiency and relevance of civil services.
