

Labour reforms

Why in news?

 $n\n$

\n

• The proposals regarding the laws governing industrial labour have been in the works for over two years, and it has found a brief mention in the Budget speech this year.

۱n

• One of the primary criticisms directed at the present Indian government has been its failure to address these laws.

۱n

• It is an important reason why the manufacturing activity not taking off as hoped.

\n

 $n\n$

What the proposed changes offer?

 $n$

\n

 The proposed changes offers flexibility in operations to the smaller companies, better compensation for the retrenched employees, a more representative character for trade unions, and a new framework for minimum wages.

۱n

- It has put in place a study-cum-work arrangement. Workers earn while they learn, and the training is linked to the prospect of real employment. It will give a new thrust to the skilling programme. It also offers better pay to those who join as apprentices.
- One proposal that is going attract criticism is A proposal to allow units employing 300 workers to shut down operations without seeking permission of govt. If approved, this would take the vast majority of companies out of the framework.
- The flip side is: those who get retrenched should get 45 days wages for every year worked. Retrenchment becomes easier and more expensive. So companies will not resort to it lightly.

۱n

• Another proposal aims to raise the qualifying floor for the formation of trade unions.

\n

 Also, smaller units will be offered a freer labour market. The binary division of the labour market into organised and unorganised segments would give way to more categorisations that enable easier transitions.

 $n\n$

 $n\n$

Source: Business Standard

\n

