

Menstrual Hygiene for Rural Women

What is the issue?

\n\n

\n

- Urban India is debating the topic of menstruation and the associated stigma.
- But breaking the mould in rural areas is far more challenging, which calls for an integrated approach.

What does NFHS data show?

\n\n

\n

- Government data suggest positive developments in the use of hygienic methods of managing menstrual periods.
- As per NFHS-4 (National Family Health Survey), 42% women in the 15-24 age group uses sanitary napkins.
- Of this, 16% use locally-prepared napkins, while 62% use cloth.
- In all, at least 58% are estimated to be using a hygienic method of menstruation.
- The data says that nearly 48% rural women in this age group are using hygienic methods.
- However, menstrual age of women goes up to 40-45 years, and a large section of women has still been left out of the survey.
- The ground reality is a lot different, with several challenges to bring about change in rural areas.

What are the limitations?

\n\n

\n

- Mindset - In rural India, the outdated value system related to periods, sexuality, etc, are much ingrained.

\n

- The resistance is severe, and much is kept literally under wraps.

\n

\n\n

\n

- Social structure - The social structure is largely patriarchal; women individuality and needs mostly come second.

\n

- There is even lesser sensitivity with respect to women's sexuality and physiology.

\n

- Taboo subject - Menstruation remains one of the biggest taboo subjects, and breaking the notions on such matters are truly challenging.

\n

- Financial viability - Making sanitary pads affordable for money-starved rural families is a limitation for promoting its use.

\n

- Media - Till date, sanitary pads' advertisements use blue as the colour to prove the effectiveness of pads.

\n

- It is essential that platforms as these turn mature enough to show the liquid and gel with what it should be, the colour red.

What are the notable initiatives?

\n\n

\n

- Chuppi Todo-Sayani Bano (roughly translated as 'break the silence and grow up') is an on-ground menstrual hygiene awareness initiative in parts of Rajasthan.

\n

- It is a private rural healthcare delivery enterprise for sanitary pads dispensation.

\n

- A key effort includes disassociating morality from menstruation.

\n

- It aims at replacing the 'right or wrong' debate with that on health, education, and development viewpoints.

\n

- Approaching topics such as menstruation with sensitivity, internal workshops are conducted.

\n

- They sensitise the field workers along with the network of Anganwadi workers from the villages.

\n

- To gain trust, influential people from village neighbourhood are identified and entrusted with implementation.

\n

- Student groups are also involved, making the efforts of sensitisation more effective.

\n

\n\n

What lies ahead?

\n\n

\n

- Poor menstrual hygiene practices have serious health challenges.

\n

- They range from urogenital or non-sexually transmitted infections, to yeast, fungal and urinary tract infections, to even cervical cancer.

\n

- Thus, the cost of following hygienic practices is far less than bearing the cost for treatment of diseases.

\n

- Initiatives as discussed above should be financed appropriately to be scaled to multiple states and remote regions.

\n

- For further progress, the discourse on menstruation needs to change in both urban and rural spaces.

\n

- A multi-layered approach focusing on awareness, accessibility, behavioural change, and identifying the target groups is essential.

\n

- Knowing which group is more approachable helps in drawing out strategies to initiate discourse, educate and trigger behaviour change.

\n

- E.g. Schoolgirls, literate and educated women are more willing to listen and contribute. Men who are socially-involved and less politically-invested are easier to convince and engage.
