

Tata's hard choice

What is the issue?

 $n\n$

Tata Steel's recent merger is a proof of hard commercial considerations in overseas acquisitions.

 $n\n$

What is the merger about?

 $n\n$

\n

- $\bullet$  Tata Steel had announced its tentative plans to merge their European steel operations in a 50:50 joint venture.
- Tata Steel and Germany's ThyssenKrupp AG have planned for this merger.
- This merger will emerge as the second largest steel producer in the high value-added European market.
- $\bullet$  These companies clarified that this merger is driven more by "industrial and strategic logic" than the need for financial engineering or job cuts. \n

What is the need for the merger?

 $n\n$

\n

- This merger is more about reducing exposure to the barely-growing and over-supplied European market.
- Tata Steel is keen to free up the capital from its overseas plants in order to double its Indian capacity.
- $\bullet$  Global operations have become a millstone around Tata Steel's neck.  $\mbox{\ensuremath{\backslash}} n$
- ThyssenKrupp has been progressively shedding its commodity businesses to focus on high-margin capital goods.

۱n

• This merger seems to be an intermediary step to a complete exit.  $\ ^{n}$

What are the challenges in this merger?

 $n\n$

\n

- $\bullet$  The merger may have a rough passage with external stakeholders.
- The labour unions and the governments of UK and Germany are already looking to ring-fence their interests.
- $\bullet$  Financial considerations are at play in this merger, with both partners looking to de-leverage their balance sheets.  $\ensuremath{\backslash} n$
- Chinese export threat is continuing to loom large.
- $\bullet$  It is unclear that how this joint venture would pay off without pricing sacrifices, cost and job cuts.  $\mbox{\sc h}$
